Marine Corps Officers Visit Muhlenberg

U. S. Marine Corps officers whose service ribbons indicate that they have seen much action in the Southwest Pacific in this war and on other fronts in World War I, yesterday told Marines stationed at Muhlenberg something about the importance of training they are receiving as they prepare to become officers of the oldest branch of America's armed forces.

Col. Clark W. Thompson and Lieut. Col. M. S. Rahiser, both of the Personnel department of the Headquarters of the United States Marine Corps, headed an official board of five that visited the Muhlenberg campus to discuss the V-12 training program with college officers and with the Marines who are in training there. Navy men in the group included Lieut. Howes and Lieut. Matthews of the Fourth Naval District training staff.
