What if your house was ground zero for the virus?

Latest in a series of posts on the coronavirus

Gadfly's barber resists wearing a mask. Sees no risk around here. This might be an interesting way to dramatize the spread.

from the Washington Post:

The novel coronavirus has killed more than 200,000 people in the United States, and if you're like us [Washington Post], you probably have trouble visualizing that catastrophe. Our graphics team has published a new interactive to help you do so. It maps every U.S. death as if they had all been your neighbors. You can simply type in your address, then watch covid-19 proliferate across your community and likely wipe it off the map.
